The method to mend credit and increase credit history is you've got to dispute each account that you think isn't right. You do this in writing and the process is called writing an argument letter. There is no standard form or dispute letter to raise credit history, but you have to identify the account you are questioning. Temporarily state why you suspect the account to be wrong.

When you send your letter make sure you send it authorized mail and you need a return bill showing that someone signed for the complaint. This may also alert you to the time the credit reporting agency has to comply with the legal requirements of 30 days. They must complete their enquiry and confirm the account is being reported properly and they must do this work within a 30 day timeline.

If the credit bureau's reject your claim then you should not give up. Do not get depressed because their job is far easier if they don't have to research. It is down to you to persuade them to verify properly all claims that you make. To do that may need one or two credit dispute letters.
